

Heckler & Koch and Proreta Tactical establish joint venture for the modernization and construction of state-of-the-art training centers and shooting ranges

Heckler & Koch and Proreta Tactical have laid the foundation for a joint venture. The aim of the joint venture is to repair, modernize, and construct state-of-the-art, realistic training infrastructure for security forces in Germany and abroad.

Partnership for practical training solutions at the highest level

“With this step, we are consistently continuing our strategic direction as a system provider: from weapons and services to training – all from a single source,” explains Dr Jens Bodo Koch, CEO of Heckler & Koch.

“Proreta Tactical is the ideal partner for this: experienced, reliable, and deeply rooted in the practical implementation of tactical training solutions. Together, we will drive the development of training methods to ensure the safety of our security forces during operations.”

The joint venture combines Heckler & Koch’s international market presence, technological expertise, and customer base with Proreta Tactical’s proven competence in the planning, construction, and operation of training and shooting facilities. Proreta also brings extensive experience from major projects for security agencies and industrial clients both within and outside Germany.

“Our strength lies in the operational implementation of demanding training infrastructure. Together with Heckler & Koch, we can now offer comprehensive solutions that take education and training to a new level,” says Alexander Keul, founder and Managing Director of Proreta Tactical. “We look forward to this partnership and to joint projects for the modernisation and development of innovative training centres that meet the real requirements of operations.”

“With this joint venture, we are setting new standards for the training of modern security forces – with quality, efficiency, and genuine proximity to operational reality,” says Marco Geißinger, Head of Sales at Heckler & Koch.
